THE THREE MUSKETEERS.

THE THREE MUSKETEERS.

(From the New York Sun.)
The Three Musketeers having boasted for years
In story and song of the way they could scrap,
Heard the roar of the guns of the Allies and Huns.
And stirred and awoke from their long dusty nap.
They grabbed up their swords and as haughty as lords
Started out to behold what the row was about.
And all in a minute they found themselves in it.
And wished—if the truth must be told—they were out.

And batteries sounded a deadiy re-frain.
They tripped on barbed wire, and they fell in the mire.
Were hit by the shrapnel that clat-tered like hall.
Were blown up by a mine and came down to recline
In a billow of gas rolling fast on the gale.

Said Porthos: "This stuff is a leetle too rough, Let us lose not a second in taking our flight
From these fire-sating Yanks with their rifles and tanks."
"We never." groaned D'Artagnan, "knew how to fight.
We'll return to the dust and our good swords may rust.
For they are no longer much use it appears; It's American grit I satute as Louit." And that was the last of the Three Musketeers.
